The Karen Hilltribes Trust William Harnden

The Karen Hilltribes Trust is a UK registered charity with a Thai Foundation registered in Bangkok.

It was the tragic death of Penelope Worsley's son, Richard that led to her setting up the charity in 1999. Richard had earlier spent six months volunteering with the Karen hill tribes people after finishing school and upon his return home begged his mother to help these people.

Tragically in 1996 he was killed in a car crash in Germany while serving as a Light Dragoon. After hearing of his death, the Karen people dedicated a water system to him in a remote village. This reminded Penelope of her son's wish to help these people.

After visiting the hill tribes a year later, Penelope saw the adversity the Karen faced on a daily basis and decided she could help.

Since 1999 and with over £2.5 million raised, The Karen Hilltribes

Trust is working in over 400 villages in a region of remote, mountainous country.

Through three key aims to improve health, education and income generation, the trust is continually supporting the Karen in projects that achieve these goals and lead to self-help and sustainability while retaining their identity and culture.

They have, to date, provided 35,000 blankets and 40,000 mosquito nets. They now provide safe, secure and clean accommodation for almost 500 school children. They have installed over 2,000 latrines servicing over 10,000 people in many villages.

Donations have helped to provide 20 buses so 400 school children get a good education. Over 200 students have gone on to university with 16 scholarships provided.

The Karen Hilltribes Trust

They have installed almost 110 clean water systems cutting typhoid by 98%. They have provided meals to over 2,000 school children that would have gone hungry.

Donor kindness has helped them to bring farm land back into production helping 4,500 people. Finally, their education programme helps support teachers to teach English and Thai to children.
